BILL BUSTER'S LETTER TO HIS FATHER

DEAR PA:—Last week I went to work in the department that has charge of the consumers. I was sent out to see if all appliances were working satisfactorily, and in almost every case I found that they were. Some of the consumers said that every time they lit a burner it made an awful noise. I showed them how they could stop it by turning on the gas a few seconds before they applied the match. In another place where a new range had just been installed, I asked the cook how he liked it. He said: "Fine; I light him last night and he no so out yet." Upon investigation, I found out that he had lit the oven and never turned it out. It is things like this which cause high bills. Occasionally we have had complaints of high bills, but have always been able to show the people where the gas was used, and as soon as they learn where the trouble is, it is very easily remedied.

One place where they had a water heater the bills were very high. We put on a test meter and found that the gas was used from two to five P. M. every day. They told me there was no one home at that time of day except the cook, so we kept watch and found that the cook was selling baths to his friends at ten cents each.

In every case I show them that as a rule they can get all the heat they need by having the burners turned very low, for by turning them higher they simply waste the gas. On one stove there is a small burner called the "simmer" which burns very little gas and will keep any vessel boiling; this burner should be used whenever possible.

Gas ranges are very easily kept clean with just a little care. It is a good plan to always have the oven doors open an inch after using, in order to allow them to dry out. If the outside is occasionally wiped off with a slightly oiled cloth, the stove will always look fine. I like this work better than any I have done yet.

With love,

BILL.

THE ROYAL DEAD TO BE REMOVED

Ceremonies Held at Night—Only Royalty Present—Preparations Complete With the Arrival of Princess.

Commencing at 8 o'clock in the evening, the ceremonies of removing the bodies of members of the royal family from their present resting places to the new mausoleum, which has been built at a cost of $20,000 appropriated by the Territorial Legislature, will begin.

Princess Kawananakoa will arrive from San Francisco on Friday next, and with her arrival arrangements will be complete for the removal of caskets containing remains of the Kalakaua dynasty to their final resting places.

The ceremony of removal of the bodies will be entirely private and will be attended with some of the old-time ceremonies attendant upon funerals of royalty.

Queen Liliuokalani will have charge of the ceremonies, and Prince Kuhio will be present if he arrives from Washington next week. Others who will take part in the ceremony will be Princess Kawananakoa, ex-Governor Claghorn and John Colburn, representing Prince Kuhio. Marston Campbell, as custodian for the Territory, will be present.

The new resting place for royal dead is a magnificent affair, gates of solid bronze barring out the visitor from the inner chamber where the bodies will lie behind slabs of solid marble.

All bodies of royalty will be placed in this resting place, and reservations have been made for Queen Liliuokalani, Prince Kuhio and ex-Governor Claghorn.

George Davis was represented by Attorney Straus, and Attorney Magoon appeared for the Chinese man and woman whose cases were continued until Tuesday at the request of counsel.
